According to the U.S. Census Bureau, approximately 8 million undocumented immigrants lived in the United States in 2014, including the more than 6 million people living in California, the most populous state. This year marks the first time the Census has counted immigrants without legal authorization since 1950. (Photo by Drew Angerer/Getty Images) WASHINGTON – The Trump administration's effort to add a citizenship question to the U.S. census may have been met with legal challenges by a state, but it was likely to attract other lawsuits as well, according to the nation's top federal judge. The fight over a constitutional question of whether the government can add the question to the decennial population count, which it hasn't asked since 1950, has ramped up this week as the Trump administration looks to add it again. Adding the citizenship question, federal and state officials said, would better help the Justice Department enforce the Voting Rights Act. The act, the administration said, makes it easier to determine whether minority populations of a state are in fact eligible to vote. Critics, including U.S. District Judge George Hazel, say the move is a pretext for political reasons. "I don't think you can take the Census and break the Constitution," Hazel, an Obama appointee, said Monday at a hearing on one of the lawsuits. Still, Hazel, who was appointed to the federal bench by President Lyndon B. Johnson, said he doesn't expect the case to be dismissed. "It's too a1d647c40b

Click "Finish" to complete the process. You can now use your license key. Source Summing it up: 'Do you want to hurt me, Daddy?' It wasn't as if I was doing anything wrong, not at the time anyway. I was merely the bait, but still... The smell of his pungent cologne filled the air. Normally I would have minded that, but there was something different about him. The man was biding his time, waiting for me to answer his question. "So, are you going to answer my question?" I'm not sure what question he was talking about. All I could tell was that he was looking down at me with piercing eyes. "Daddy," I said, "why are you doing this?" "You're almost my age now," he said, his hand still on the door handle, "why do you think I'm doing this?" "You said it was so that I would learn." "And would you want to hurt me?" he asked. The question was impossible to answer. He could have asked me if I wanted to shoot him. It would have been a much more simple question to answer. "No Daddy." "I know you would never want to hurt me," he said, "even when you were young." I don't know what he was getting at, but I knew it wasn't a serious question. "What do you want to do?" he asked. Again the question was a challenge, but I wasn't afraid of him. He was old enough to
