16, 2013; Houston, TX, USA; Houston Rockets shooting guard Josh Smith (5) against the Minnesota Timberwolves in the second half at Toyota Center. Houston Rockets defeated Minnesota Timberwolves 93-80. Mandatory Credit: Troy Taormina-USA TODAY Sports. Josh Smith spent the first few years of his NBA career recording his prime years in Detroit while playing alongside future hall-of-famer and perennial All-Star Andre Drummond. Ultimately, Smith would part ways with the Pistons in 2013. He then spent the next year and a half in Milwaukee before re-joining the Pistons' roster for the 2015 season. After spending three seasons in Detroit, Smith was traded to the Houston Rockets in a deal that sent their own All-Star starter, big men Greg Monroe, and five players to the Pistons. The trade sent a message and the Rockets wanted it heard that they were open to any trade opportunities, not just the ones that they had in the past. They wanted to continue to build upon the success of their 2014-2015 season with the nucleus of a playoff team. Before then, Smith was part of the discussion of a potential Dwight Howard trade. Houston really wanted Howard and believed that he could be their franchise player. He would be a perfect fit, but the Pistons didn't want to part ways with a hometown guy like Smith. Detroit believed that they could have the best of both worlds in Smith, Howard, but there would be no perfect solution. The Pistons ultimately concluded that they would rather trade away Drummond, Monroe, and a few prospects for Smith and even Hedo Turkoglu rather than letting go of their All-Star shooting guard. That way, if Howard desired a trade after being traded from the Magic, the Pistons wouldn't be able to say 'no' to him. The trade that finalized the Dwight Howard trade was completed just six days after the trade to Houston. THE ROOSTER(S) IN CHAOS Once the deal was completed, Smith joined the Rockets. Everything was running smoothly and Smith fit in just fine. He picked it up right away in Houston and Houston wanted him to be one of the leaders on the team. Smith helped out tremendously by looking to improve and change all of their bad habits from their 8th seed performance of 2014 to their 27-55 start. By the end of the season, they finished at 46-36. They finished with a solid.500 record
