AX540.Two-color quantum interference in a double-slit interferometer.

We describe a new experiment that demonstrates the quantum character of the interference pattern in a Mach-Zehnder interferometer with one path containing a thin absorbing layer. The interference pattern shows phase shifts that are a function of the absorption depth. These results represent a first experimental observation of the recently predicted double-slit quantum interference. They also imply that the absorption experiment is an efficient way to estimate the transmission depth of a thin layer. Piercing hot scientific case, nuclear case, and so on) down to the fact that both sides seek a world where nobody has to work (I think I would personally applaud this). It seems to me that John McCain's shift to the center on such topics is a pure grab for power. It is much easier for McCain to say he is a "maverick" than "evangelical" - and his campaign is doing a great job of making sure that the middle/center voters are listening to all this. It reminds me of how Bill Clinton's middle ground so appealed to all the centrists - and they took Clinton out of the political world. And finally, a comment in the NYT blog mentioning the impact of having a global economy. Dear Mr. Dorn, As an economist with the University of

I want to make a shared object (the dynamically linkable object) from my C++ code. I am getting this error when I try to export main.o: ld: symbol(s) not found for architecture i386 clang: error: linker command failed with exit code 1 (use -v to see invocation) How can I specify the path of where to look for the main function at link time? To export a function I do: extern "C" void foo(); extern "C" void foo() { } and then for other functions I do: extern "C" int main() { /* code */ } A: You can use the rpath, rpathdir, rpathprefix CFLAGS and LDFLAGS. See this page for more details. A: You can simply specify the location of the main() function in the linker command line. Make sure you also include the path to the object file (the dynamic linker will look for a main() function in the object file).
